Join our inaugural corps of volunteers in this fresh, interactive, cutting-edge environment.

Q?rius, (pronounced “curious”), is a new way to connect science with everyday experiences. Through real-world questions with scientists and interactions with thousands of authentic objects, visitors can unleash their curiosity with surprising results.

Volunteers are needed to greet and orient visitors, encourage visitor exploration in fun, experimental, and creative activities, and learn more about behind-the-scenes scientific research.

For a complete description of this opportunity, please visit, http://www.mnh.si.edu/education/volunteering/volopps.html

For more information and an application, email Q?rius Volunteer Coordinator Jill Sanderson, sandersonj@si.edu. Or call 202-633-2122.

Part lab, part collections vault, part DIY garage, part hangout, and all fun – Q?rius, Unlock your world.

www.qrius.si.edu

Training begins September 28th
at the National Museum of Natural History

Photo credit: Jill Sanderson